Doukhobor Trial Opens

'I Don't Remember'

NELSON (CP) — A Sons of Freedom Doukhobor woman charged with assaulting a police constable told a magistrate's court Monday: "I don't remember touching him."

Mrs. William Perepelkin is charged with assaulting RCMP constable J. D. Flamank when police went to the Freedomite headquarters at Krestova April 10 to investigate a Doukhobor school. Her trial was adjourned Monday until April 27.

Police retreated from the school after Doukhobor women showered their cars with eggs and mud.

Mrs. Perepelkin testified Monday she remembered going up to the constables and accusing them of being the ones who took her two children, Walter and Dennis, from her the previous day. The two boys were taken to a provincial government dormitory school at New Denver for Freedomite children whose parents refuse to send them to school.

"I do not remember anything after that," she told Magistrate William Evans. "I remember several women helping me up from the ground. The officers had left by then. I could not see them anywhere."

About 100 people, most of them Freedomite women, crowded into the courtroom for the trial.

Constable Flamank testified that Mrs. Fanny Storgoff acted as spokesman for the group as well as interpreter.

"She told us that the women were going to run the school. We acquired the information we wanted and were about to withdraw when the defendant (Mrs. Perepelkin) burst from the crowd. She shouted at me, calling me a kidnapper and murderer and used abusive language."

Constable Flamank told the court that Mrs. Perepelkin struck him on the chest several times and was finally restrained by one of the Freedomite men.

"She burst out of the crowd a second time, repeating her insults and striking me on the chest several times."
